

On the validity of conventional statistical tests given evidence of nonsynchronous trading and nonlinear dynamics in returns generating process: A further note

Abstract

Given the growing empirical evidence that returns predictability follows an evolutionary path, it calls into question not only the usefulness of conventional statistical tests of market efficiency as highlighted by Saadi et al. (2006), but also the adequacy of the efficient markets hypothesis to explain observed market dynamics.