

Covid-19 and its impact on self-employed women

ABSTRACT

Debates and studies about self-employed women are very important during the Covid-19 pandemic in designing strategies to diminish the negative impact of the crisis on this particular group of workers. The methodology used for this paper consists of a library search and an evaluation of the literature. References are based on online databases. Women face various challenges when they are self-employed and the Covid-19 pandemic has aggravated their problems. This article studies the challenges encountered by self-employed women and discusses some of the initiatives to address the issues faced by them.
